The fire is supposed to have started in the boiler-room in the basement. It was first seen by a citizen, who white passing noticed a blaze in the basement. He awakened Rugene Sheehan, who lives at 317 and who owns a stable the rear of which is in close proximity to the factory. Shechan ran to the box at the corpse of First avenue and Sixty-sixth street and rang an alarm. He then got the horses out of the stable and brought them to a place of safety. There were nineteen of them, belonging to various parties.

The flames soon ate their way from the basement to the first floor, and notwithatanding the efforts of the firemen, they spread through the entire structure to the root.

The factory has a frontage of 75 feet and is 100 feet deed, including a three-story structure in the rear. The fire also communicated to the rear building, which was soon ablaze. Every floor was filled with inflammable muterial and the fremen's utmost efforts to keep the fames from going through the charge were without avail.

"This question." he said, "is a matter, which is entirely in the hands of the trustees, and as this is a private and not a public corporation I suppose they have a right to say what saiaries shall be paid.

"As for myself I have been receiving my present salary for the last seventeen yoars, and not one of the trustees has ever objected to it on the ground that it was too large.

"I am responsible for the $6,000,000 worth of art treasures contained in the collection, and the care of such a valuable collection necessarily involves a considerable expense. It is a constant and continuous source of anxiety and trouble, and the compensation of those who have charge of it is evidently, in the opinion of the trustees, not excessive.

"However, that has nothing to do with the question of the city's contribution to the running expenses of the Museum, in the opinion of the trustees, and i do not care to say anything more in regard to the matter."
